

Emergency Lighting - BS 5266

EL001

This one day course is based upon BS5266:1, BS5266:7 and BS5266:8.

Emergency lighting is essential for the safety of building occupants.

It is vital that the emergency lighting automatically operates in the event of normal lighting failure. The illumination levels and period of time the illumination can be sustained should be sufficient to allow the building occupants to evacuate safely and locate both fire alarm, firefighting and first aid equipment.

The course provides the necessary information to designate emergency escape routes and design and commission an emergency lighting scheme to BS 5266.

The morning of the course is spent reading through and interpreting the relevant parts of BS 5266. The afternoon takes the form of a practical workshop where a system is designed and the participant is then introduced to the practical issues of commissioning, inspection and testing, certification and reporting.

Fire Alarms - BS 5839

FA001

This two day course is based upon BS 5839:1, BS 5839:6

Fire alarm systems are essential for the safety of life and/or property.

In general, it is appropriate to install some form of fire alarm system in virtually all buildings, except very small relatively open planned buildings. The initiation of alarm can be either manual or automatic, or a combination of both, as is usually the case. The level of cover required by a building is based upon a fire risk assessment and a suitable system selected to meet this need.

The course provides the necessary information to design, construct and commission a non-addressable fire alarm system to BS 5839.

The first day of the course is spent reading through and interpreting the relevant parts of BS 5839. The second day takes the form of a practical workshop where a system is designed, constructed and inspected and tested. The participant is then introduced to the practical issues of system maintenance, certification and reporting.
